In iOS 7 there is the new UIAccessibilityMute method, which can be used to mute the sound for a given list of UIAccessibilityNotifications. The problem with this is, that it will also mute out all the unwanted sounds on that list. However, UIAccessibility events can be used to add accessibility events to views. This in turn allows you to add custom actions to view controllers. Unfortunately, this custom action access only allows it to be performed on a view you've already interacted with. If it is possible to add accessibility events to views which don't have any sound, it would allow me to add a custom action which is only performed when the view has been interacted with, while playing. This in turn could mute out unwanted sounds that the view is not part of, while not affecting the sound on the view I'm about to interact with. A: An alternative approach: Use accessibilityMuteThenUnMute, which will mute the system's active "Overall Sound" while unmuting all the other notifications. Then you can customize one of the UIAccessibilityNotification handlers to distinguish between the audible notifications, and those that are not. WORDS Someone recently mentioned to me that seeing my music all over the internet is my dream come true. It's a thought that I've always had but never really gave much thought to. I've always assumed my music was a reflection of how I was feeling at the time, and how

Website Worth, PageRank and Alexa Traffic Analysis Worth.com is arguably the most comprehensive and user-friendly membership site for ranking your blog or your favorite website's worth. PageRank is the standard metric to determine a site's worth. Which is all fine and dandy, but how about traffic numbers? What if you have 1,000 daily unique users, 200 of which are from England but your Alexa rank only gives you a paltry 1,000 rank, isn't that a bit of a let down? What if they all come from Google?
